Serviceman Flies To Father's Bedside With Aid Of Red Cross

MARCH is Red Cross Month. A Red Cross volunteer will be calling at your door, asking for funds for the Red Cross. The support you give is very important.

Every county in Virginia has a Red Cross Chapter. Depending on the size, the workers are either paid or volunteer. Appomattox is an example of a volunteer chapter.

Most chapters, however, have at least one paid person called an executive secretary, with an average yearly salary of approximately $1,000 per year. The executive secretary has a dual emergency and routine welfare inquiries as well as disaster relief.

The Red Cross is not a general relief agency except in time of disaster. Only limited service is given to civilians. Red Cross activity is for servicemen and veterans and their families.

The Executive Secretary is supervised by a board of directors and a chapter chairman who are all volunteers. These people are elected yearly at a general meeting by anyone who has a Red Cross membership signifying that he has contributed $1.00 or more to the Red Cross.

Let's follow a routine case. The Executive Secretary gets a telephone call at 7 p.m. at her home. It is the mother of a serviceman stationed in Korea. She informs the executive secretary that her husband is gravely ill in a local hospital. She wants her son home.

The executive secretary takes all the necessary information; contacts the doctor for his recommendation; phones or wires the Red Cross National Headquarters, Washington, D. C., at the chapter's expense.

Here the message is put on teletype and sent to the military communications center. In a short time the wire arrives at the desk of the Red Cross Field Director in Korea. The serviceman is called — he makes the decision to come home or not. If the answer is "Yes", he makes a request for emergency leave.

The Red Cross cannot recommend emergency leave. It is only the agency which sends and delivers the hometown physician's recommendation. From then on, it's up to the military.

A serviceman on emergency leave has priority over other passengers on a plane. Coming from Korea, he would probably land at Travis AFB, California, where the Red Cross office, open 24 hours a day, is available to arrange further transportation and if necessary, to lend him travel and maintenance funds without interest.

The wire advising that leave was granted will usually arrive at the local chapter in most cases only a few hours after such leave is granted.

Unless this happens in your family, you may never know about it. Such information cannot be released unless the serviceman so desires. Such service goes on every day, year after year, because you and neighbors support YOUR RED CROSS.

Lions Publish McAden Tribute

In their club publication, "Lion's Tale", Appomattox Lions Club published the following tribute: "Sadly, we report the passing of Lion J. M. McAden February 2. Few men have gained as much esteem on the part of fellow club members in so short a time as Lion McAden. Our deepest sympathy to his family."

Yankee Remembers McLean House

At least one Northern lady remembers the "McLean House," focal point of interest at nearby Appomattox National Historical Park, now being reproduced on stationery being sold by the Appomattox Junior Woman's Club. Miss Fannie Reed, of Dayton, Ohio, was one of the first to receive a letter on the new stationery. She writes, "I can remember pictures of the 'Old McLean House' in our History Book at School seventy some years ago.

The original house was torn down in 1893, seventy-two years ago; then reconstructed in 1949.

Winter Management Of Beef Cows

Winter is the time of year when the beef cattleman has to labor over his enterprise, says Curtis Mast, beef specialist at Virginia Polytechnic Institute. No other time does the cow herd need as much attention as when calves are coming and while they are young.

One of the big problems is sanitation. Young calves arriving in the middle of winter should be kept out of the mud, and need to be away from the the enemies of young beef calves. If they can be controlled, there is little that will hurt a beef calf, if he gets enough to eat!

For these reasons, many producers prefer to run cow herds on open pastures during the season when calves are small. However, this adds to the problem of watching cows at calving time and feeding them.

Mast says, "It looks like we will be driven more and more to permanent feeding facilities for cows, to conserve labor. This will mean fence line feeders and auger feeders around permanent silos. These should be constructed so a minimum of mud, water, and filth will accumulate around them to lessen likelihood of calves pickinp up infection.

"Naturally, the person using a hay feeding program who is hauling hay to pasture will have little difficulty with calf diseases. However, the time this takes and the problem of getting out on pastures in some weather is forcing people towards permanent installations.

The calves that come in the winter are the ones that are heavy at market time. They are also the ones that stand the greatest chance of being frozen when born or having some other calving difficulty. So, it is good management to constantly sort out cows about to calve and move them into a clean barn lot or shed at night during severe weather. At least keep them close where they can be watched constantly during the day.

The secret to having a 100 percent calf crop is to go into the winter with all cows bred and then stay on hand as they calve to see that nothing happens to the calf until he is on his feet and nursing. The only practical way to do this is to gradually move cows out into a calving lot as they are ready, and then put them back with the main herd after the calf gets here.

Midwestern research shows that checking the cow herd four times a day paid about four times as much per hour labor spent as where the herd was checked only once a day. The reason is that if a cattleman checks a herd four times a day, rarely will he lose a calf through calving difficulties.

Most folks are wintering their cow herd on short rations this year, says Mast. This means the average cow herd will not give as much milk to calves as usual. It will be wise to creep feed baby calves as soon as they will eat, and let them have the creep feed until grass arrives. December and January calves, especially, will need more feed than they will get from their mothers in March and early April.

Little calves will start eating at quite a young age, says the specialist, if feed is available. With milk a little short they will begin eating sooner.

It wont require very much grain to creep feed them at this age until grass gets here, but it will put them in much better condition and have them in a healthy growing state. On grass, they will make excellent gains and come out with maximum bloom and smooth neat fall.

It will also be cheaper to put the grain directly into the calves than to put it through the cow to get her to give the extra milk needed. Mast says, "So, for the cow man who is short of feed and buying feed, this is the time to creep feed calves.

F H A Promotes Home Safety

According to the National Safety Council more than one-third of all the nations accident fatalities occur in or around the home. With thousands of deaths, millions of injuries and many dollars lost because of accidents, accident prevention has become of the utmost importance to everyone.

The Future Homemakers of America, Appomattox Chapter is carrying out projects to overcome safety hazards and decrease accidents in the home. Several monthly programs have been devoted to safety.

Sgt. Morris of the Virginia State Police, showed a film and gave a talk on Safety at the November meeting.

Mr. James Smith, County Agent presented a program on Safety in the Home, for the February meeting. Mr. Smith listed the most common home accidents, and told how these could be prevented.

Safety bulletins have been given to the F.H.A. members, and as a means of checking on safety in the home, every student in the Future Homemakers Club has been given a home safety check sheet.

Posters, exhibits and films will be used to further advance the work on Home Safety.

Stamps For Vets

Veterans of U. S Wars like to collect stamps, and Junior Woman's Club members like to collect stamps so they can send them on. President Mrs. Peggy Lawson asks all citizens to save commemorative stamps, foreign issues, and any U. S. stamp over 5c value for this worthy project. Each club member needs to turn in 100 stamps for proper club credit. Mrs. Libby Sneed has set up two boxes at Sneed's Pharmacy to collect the stamps — also Vets Dogfood Labels, another club project. Residents can help Jr. Club members go "over the top' by taking by stamps and labels to Sneed's— or by giving them directly to a member.

Emergencies Are Real In "Make Believe War," Says Red Cross

by David Snow, Red Cross Field Representative

In mid - summer of '63 the Army and Air Force had an exercise called Swift Strike. With more than 100,000 men involved it was inevitable that emergencies would arise. The Red Cross was there, offering service and help.

One trooper, needing transportation home on emergency leave, found out that a commercial airline would not take his personal check. American Red Cross verified the serviceman's permit for emergency leave, then assured the airline they would lend the man the money, if necessary. His personal check was accepted. Then, when the serviceman, still 100 miles away from the nearest airport, found out he had no commercial transportation to get there, the RC men, Harmon and Smith, "threw away the book"— and flagged motorists until they found one bound for Charlotte.

American Red Cross liason representative, Hal Whisnant, handled many emergencies in Spartanburg, S.C. He informed an infantry captain his small daughter had been hospitalized—the captain was given emergency leave. An emergency loan went to a man whose pay records had been delayed. A family doctor was sent a physician's report on Robert Martin's 126 game and Harold Martin's 336 set.
